Research and Scholarship

Contemporary efforts in the helping professions are guided by a biopsychosocial/spiritual (BPSS) model that recognizes and honors the complex interactions between multiple systems that make up our patients and families (and those in which they reside). My work in research is situated at the middle of this BPSS model and continuum – specifically, at the intersection(s) of families and health. The three principal arenas in which I endeavor to create new knowledge and inform best-practices include:

- 1) interdisciplinary collaboration in family therapy and family medicine (e.g., Medical Family Therapy, collaborative family health care, integrated behavioral health);
- 2) engaging families and communities in health initiatives (e.g., Citizen Health Care, community-based participatory research); and
- 3) trauma/disaster-response and fieldwork (e.g., Psychological First Aid, systemic interventions during acute phases of disasters).

Research Grants

The majority of the work that I do in research centers on professionals' collaboration with families and community members in the design, implementation, and evaluation of health interventions. By design, community-based participatory research (CBPR) initiatives encompass Co-Principal Investigator arrangements; this serves to formally recognize the nature of the University / Community partnership(s) that are ultimately advanced.

Family Education Diabetes Series (FEDS)

This community-based participatory research (CBPR) project works to engage low-income, urban-dwelling American Indians (AIs) and their families in an active forum of education, fellowship, and support. Its mission is to improve the health and well-being of AI people through diabetes education, fellowship, and support in manners that embrace their heritage, values, and culture.

This grant advanced an interdisciplinary- and interagency- team to prepare for, receive, and coordinate efforts to support incoming refugee families from Afghanistan to the State of Minnesota. Said efforts spanned from medical intake processes upon arrival at MSP airport and immediate transitional housing needs in local hotels, to acute mental health (psychological first aid) and long(er) term social support, alongside external referrals (e.g., OBGYN, urgent primary care/pediatrics, medications for chronic health issues, and urgent dental, vision, and specialty care) as indicated. Formal assessment(s) regarding the effectiveness of these efforts are ongoing.

East-Metro American Indian Diabetes Initiative (EMAIDI)

This CBPR project represents a purposeful partnership uniting University of Minnesota researchers and providers with four American Indian organizations that collectively serve urban-dwelling youth, adults, and elders. It was created in response to gaps in scholarship, care, and outreach that have (a) neglected complex hardships of living in urban contexts; (b) failed to effectively engage minority men; (c) not tapped powerful processes in family- and community- support; and (d) advanced fragmented knowledge and services secondary to competitive (vs. collaborative) structures for limited funding.

Preventing Compassion Fatigue in Disaster-Responders

Using CBPR methods, our team is working to revise and field-test the UMN Responder Self-Care App. We envision a personally-customizable tool that serves to aid responders' attention to their physical, psychological, and social well-being. This will differ from other self-care inventories and tools by nature of its "in-the-field" usability, insofar as it will (a) be used during deployments (versus pre- and post-deployment timeframes, only), (b) be individualized to unique user needs (versus a one-size-fits-all approach), and (c) be used in an electronic format (which will lend itself to easy data collection and analysis, while still ensuring appropriate human-subjects protection and confidentiality).

Citizen Professional Demonstration Project

The goal of this initiative was to increase the capacity of Hennepin County for community engagement by expanding training in democratic, civic engagement that activates the resources of the community to solve health and social problems. We worked with a group of six county professionals to learn the core principles and craft of Citizen Professional work. This group is now generating projects that engage communities in the following areas: reducing youth violence in the American Indian community; improving the health of African American women; raising school readiness in the Latinx community; and increasing high school retention and graduation in the Latinx community.

Developing Citizen Health Care Homes

This project served to develop a framework for deeper engagement of patients in Health Care Homes. This citizenship has three levels: personal and family responsibility for one's own health care, a vehicle to do health care together via peer Health Goal Groups, and opportunities for patient leadership development and co-responsibility for the mission of health clinics.

Collaborative Family Support

This initiative sought to learn about parents' experiences with the supports offered in Ramsey County emergency departments. Specific foci included (a) whether collaborative transition supports are correlated with lower rates of youth repeat visits, and (b) how a whole-family collaborative intervention impacts caregiver coping, family protective factors, and youth resilience among at-risk families of children in a mental health crisis.

Hmong Women United Against Depression

This initiative engaged local providers and representatives of the Saint Paul Hmong community in a collaborative partnership oriented to investigating, understanding, and improving the lives of patients and refugees who are struggling with a variety of life stressors related to depression, chronic physical health problems, and psychosocial difficulties associated with relocation. Its mission is to tap the wisdom and resources of the Saint Paul Hmong community to empower, support, encourage, and offer hope to Hmong women and their families who live with depression.

Trauma Informed Care

This initiative will support an interdisciplinary team (psychology, family social science and mental/behavioral healthcare, chaplaincy/spiritually-integrated trauma care, trauma epidemiology, and biomedicine) to produce a systematic review for Trauma-Informed Care (TIC). Given the lack of consensus on TIC definitions and models, and the potential impact of TIC to improve health outcomes, this work will inform clinicians, patients, and other stakeholders to make informed decisions about screening, evaluation, and treatment.

Reducing Childhood Obesity Using Ecological Momentary Intervention (EMI) and Video Feedback at Family Meals

Through an innovative collaboration between the UMN's Department of Family Medicine and Community Health, Department of Family Social Science, and the School of Public Health, our team is now designing, initiating, and advancing a five-year randomized control trial with socioeconomically and racially/ethnically diverse (i.e., African American, Hispanic, Native American, White), overweight (BMI $\geq 85\%$ tile) children ages 5-7 (n=376) and their families. The three study arms include: (1) Education+EMI, (2) Education+EMI+ video feedback, and (3) attention control. Outcomes will be assessed at baseline, 9, 12 (i.e., post-intervention), and 18 months (i.e., 6 months post-intervention).

Project for Advancing Healthcare Stewardship (PAHS)

We are working to advance a collaborative project aimed at facilitating social conversations about health and health care. This effort will facilitate social discourse to help patients and their families recognize and communicate about the care that they want within the constraints of what is available and potentially effective, and provide tools and resources to help them do so. Our community-driven focus is unique, engaging individuals first as active participants in the healthcare system, and second through their roles as providers or patients. Our team is incorporating perspectives from evidence-based practice, narrative medicine, behavioral health, sustainability, and community engagement.

The electronic Primary Care Research Network (ePCRN)

The ePCRN is an electronic infrastructure that facilitates the conduct of randomized controlled trials (RCTs) in primary care and promotes the translation of research findings into practice. It provides a secure, Internet-based electronic infrastructure that enables primary care practices in the United States to link with researchers in academic centers or the National Institutes of Health (NIH) to facilitate recruitment, entry, and follow-up of participants in multidisciplinary RCTs.
